Since I lest wrote I have had the pleaseure of paying once more my respects to Vieter Hugo, having accompanied our celebrated publisher, Mr. J. B. Lippincott, when he went, by appointment, to call on the illustrious poet. Victor Hugo's new hotel is spacious and handsome, though devoid of protession. Standing, as it does, on the wide, airy Avenue d'Eglau, in one of the highest and best situated quarters of the city, and with a garden of quite large dimensions for a Paris house extending behind it, it is admirably adapted to give to the veteran poet the advantage of pure air and abundant sunshine. He receives every evening from half past 9 till 11 o'clock, and his pretty parlor is always filled with callers. There is something almost regal, yet wholly appropriate and kindly, about this simple, cordial approachableness (I must here coin a word for want of one to express what I mean.) Any one who is introduced by a fried or acquaintance can come to these charming informal receptions. You enter (after ringing at a veritable American looking front door,) a square hall, paved with concrete in a Pompelian pattern. You deposit there your wraps, and a servant then opens the door, and, sweeping aside a silken pertiere, ushers you into the presence of Victor Hugo. -You will find yourself in a square parlor of ample dimensions. The walls and chiing are concealed beneath full draperies of a Persian pattened silk in gay, yet harmonious, colors, relived against a ground work of crimson. The mantel piece is hidden beneath a spleaded covering of crimson velvet, wrought with antique embroidery, and a bright wood fire blazes on the hearth. Here and there a gilt bracket against the wall supports an antique Chicese vase. The carpet is a rich inequatio, with a white ground covered with an arabespue pattern and with a bordering of vivid blue. The funiture is of fine Auguson taspestry with gift we dwork. In the carner stands a statute on a pedestal, representing Victor Hugo in a musing attitude. The master of the house goes from group to group, smiling, chatting and saying some pleasant, kindly word to each visiter. Now be drops into a chair beside M. Parrie, the director of the Comedia to say something about the fortherming revival of Ruy Blar; n. x: he pauses to say something about American literature to our great publisher; then he gives a kindly word or two to a very young poer with very wild hair, who has come to asked his advice on some literary question.

Mesnwhile Mme Drougt and his daughter-in aw, Mme. Lockroy, converse with other sucests, among whom I note Heart Houseage and his beautiful American with Victor Hugo is locking exceedingly well, and his not apparently sing exceedingly were, and has not apparently single by a single hour since I first and him, five years ago. The constitution is no upright as ever the keen black eyes sparale with all their older in tra, beneath the shadow of that spicedid dome-like brow, and the full white looks and Deard show no chiancing of their latti fance As additional scade of tan, won in his sea-and additions and deserve is all two change that con-be discorned by the minutest scruting. As the hour for retiring approaches, we ben't low over the honored hand and depart, bearing with an the kindest and most pressure of invitations to repeat our visit. SWEARING MATCHES IN MASSACHUSETTS. -An experienced school teacher said, in a public assembly the other evening, that he believed profane swearing to be spreading alarmingly among the boys of this city. He had known instances where a local school boys, just dismissed from their lessons, had arrayed themselves in a line along the feact and set up a competitive swearing exercise, just to see who e uld uster the most blood-cutdling oaths.
